and I love how her blog is funny and encourages 20-somethings to travel. I bought her book after a few other bloggers did positive reviews on their blogs. Despite how much I like Stephanie's blog, this is a review of the e-book so I'll stick to that. The book is made up of improved versions of her old blog posts. I have been wary about books using blog posts but the stories in the book didn't feel like they were posts. Instead, they felt more like short short stories and were very entertaining. Since I haven't been following her blog for too long, some of the stories were new to me (for example, the one about 3D porn--you HAVE to read that). Those new discoveries were the best stories in the book. My only gripe about the book is that it is too short. I was able to finish the book within an evening. I understand that $2.99 is the usual price for self-publishing authors but compared to other $2.99's, "A Year Without Makeup" ended too soon. Still, if you are a fan of Twenty-Something Travel, this is a good chance to support the writer that you like. But the thought that part of the money will go to Thought Catalog (the publisher) gives me a stomachache. However, if you are looking for a long read about traveling, then Catherine Ryan Howard might be a better choice for the same price. 0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. Meh By Erin This book was... Okay. It wasn't terrible. It wasn't awe inspiring. It was literally just okay. The length bothered me the most. At only 111 pages, there should have been a lot more book. There really wasn't much meat and potatoes to it. It had very few specific anecdotes that went into such detail that it transported me to a different time and a different continent. And the spelling and grammar errors drove me nuts. I've read unbeta'd fan fictions with better sentence structure. My advice, wait until this book is available for a penny plus shipping and then get it. It is definitely not worth $13+. 0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. A quick, fun, and insightful read By christine e pagan I feel like I just spent several hours curled up on comfy chairs and listened to a friend tell me all about her travel adventures over drinks. Which I love! She tells you how she felt, honestly, and let's you in on the good and the bad of the places where she's been. The good parts are told in a way that makes you want to jump up and go there, with just enough detail to give you an idea of where to start without sounding like a list or an itinerary. And she doesn't really complain about the not-so-good things, rather she made me want to still see some things on my own, but I feel I would be able to observe and quickly move on to things that are more my style. She definitely inspired me to think of long-term traveling as a possibility and not a far-off fantasy.

Have you ever wanted to quit your job and go travel the world? At 25 years old Stephanie Yoder was already fed up with the monotony of 9-5 life. After much agonizing, she quit her stable desk job to backpack around Asia. During a year of travel through Japan, China and South East Asia she became a minor Chinese celebrity, was attacked by giant parrots and met the love of her life. In A Year Without Make-Up, Yoder chronicles some of her craziest adventures along with providing helpful tips and encouragement for others looking to make a life change.
