but is also a good, enjoyable book to read. I usually give it to my children when they're 11 or 12 to read on their own and see them utilize the information. One of my daughters was able to identify the tracks of several different animals (deer, fox, and groundhog) that were on our property thanks to this book, and we've all used the information about weather and insects even more frequently. Now that my children are older I thought I would pass on our copy to another homeschooling family, but was told by two of my sons that they wanted to keep it. I ended up buying the other family a copy of the book, and will likely buy more in the future to give as gifts.

A how-to guide for the weekend naturalist that is a practical owner's manual for your local woods.
